Natural gas service should be turned off in unoccupied units and vacant buildings.

Federal law requires natural gas meters to be turned off in unoccupied units and buildings when service has been discontinued. National Grid asks for your help to accomplish this.

If you manage or own property that has been unoccupied due to a vacancy for a length of time, the gas meter may be running.

Natural gas services are frequently left on in unoccupied buildings and apartments. However, these services may incur unnecessary fees or pose a danger to your property and the community.

Contact National Grid if you know any properties that will be unoccupied due to a vacancy for several days, a week, a month or more. If your premise is used seasonally but requires gas service throughout its vacancy, please contact National Grid and we will note this on the account.

National Grid wants to ensure that your rental properties are secure, and we will turn the meters back on when notified that gas service is requested.

Smell Gas. Act Fast.
